

Acknowledgements

If one is more interested in human beings than in econometrics, this acknowledgement is probably more interesting to read than the remaining chapters of this thesis as it tells (a tiny bit) more about the interpersonal relationships of the author and the way in which he experiences the world. In this acknowledgement I wish to thank several people who, in some way, have helped me during the course of this project. The defect of this acknowledgement is that it fails to express the pleasure I experienced in meeting these people. With this in mind, I cautiously proceed.

First, I want to thank my supervisor Teun Kloek for his stimulating support during the whole project. It has been a great pleasure to do research with him. He always carefully read and discussed everything I wrote, which undoubtedly has left its marks on the way I write and on the way I look at texts written by others. Moreover, his broad research interests have stimulated me to work on several research projects that I would not have taken up on my own. I also wish to thank him for his critical remarks during the final stages of the project, which resulted in a more concise formulation of the theses that accompany this dissertation.

Second, I owe my thanks to the members of the ‘small scientific committee’, Herman van Dijk, Richard Gill, and Peter Rousseeuw, for the effort they put into reading the first version of this thesis and commenting on it. It is only after having gone through the whole manuscript several times myself that I can fully appreciate the effort other people put into reading my work.

Third, I wish to thank my coauthors: Ronald van Dijk, Philip Hans Franses, Patrick Groenendijk, Henk Hoek, and Casper de Vries. Writing econometric articles on my own was fun. Writing such articles together with other researchers was even more fun. I especially appreciated the intense cooperation with Ronald van Dijk during several research projects.

Fourth, many people have helped me in providing hints or solutions to some of the puzzles I was confronted with when doing research, when trying to get the computer to work, when trying to get the software to run, etc. Moreover, several people have provided valuable comments on some of my work. I would like to mention explicitly Karim Abadir, Jan Brinkhuis, Martin Carree, Laurens de Haan, René den Hertog, Christiaan Hey, Søren Johansen, Frank Kleibergen, Alex Koning, Pieter Kop Jansen, Francesco Lippi, Bertrand Melenberg, Jeroen de Munnik, Richard Paap, Franz Palm, Liang Peng, Gary Phillips, Berend Roorda, Peter Schotman, Ashoke Sinha, Benne Weger, and Rob Zuidwijk. I apologize to all I have forgotten, among whom are the anonymous referees of several journals. I assure them that their help was valued as much as that of the people mentioned above.

Fifth, I gratefully acknowledge the financial support of several institutions. I thank N.W.O. for sponsoring several visits to meetings of the econometric society, Shell for sponsoring my flight to the world meeting of the econometric society in Tokyo, the E.C. for sponsoring my visit to Oxford, and the University of Antwerp and the University of Exeter for sponsoring visits to Antwerp and Exeter, respectively. Of course, I also owe my gratitude to the Tinbergen Institute and its staff for providing me with the means (including financial sponsoring) to do research and to communicate with other researchers.

To conclude this acknowledgement, I would like to thank several persons whose involvement and support is not restricted to the scientific side of this project. I thank my parents for everything they gave me. It is largely due to their efforts that I am as I am today. I also thank Deborah for her love, patience, and interest. The fact that she took care of everything except the econometric research allowed me to finish my thesis in reasonable time. Her interest even went that far that she went through most of the articles I wrote. Living with her and Eline is a wonderful experience.

Finally, I owe my continuing thanks to my living Lord. He gave me life, health, motivation, and all the means necessary to live and work. Sometimes it is difficult to see how writing a thesis like this contributes to His coming kingdom. Perhaps the various talks I had with several academic people on fundamental issues in life has served a purpose in this respect. At least I myself learnt a lot from these discussions.
